BROWSE MY SITE ~ amiseliter. The White House announced on Tuesday afternoon that President Trump will nominate Kelly Knight Craft, current U.S. ambassador to the United Kingdom, to be the next United States ambassador to the United Nations. Craft has spent the last eight years as America's ambassador to the United Kingdom. Her nomination comes at a time when the Trump administration is facing intense criticism over its hostility to the U.N. system. The U.N. system is currently grappling with the ongoing controversy over North Korea's missile tests. The U.N. Security Council unanimously approved new sanctions against North Korea last month, sending a strong message to Pyongyang that it is not welcome to test missiles or carry out nuclear and other illegal activities, to which the North responded with threats of further nuclear tests. Though many officials in the Trump administration, as well as the defense community, strongly suggest that North Korea is driving the international condemnation against them, the United Nations has been resolute in its demands that no more sanctions be loosened in response to North Korea's actions. The North's provocations put considerable pressure on the Trump administration, which is desperate to try to forge a strategy that can accomplish the president's goal of stopping Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions. Earlier this year, Trump took to Twitter to suggest he was willing to accept sanctions relief in exchange for dismantling the North's nuclear program, a goal widely seen as impossible. Trump also has no plan to deal with the serious threat of Iran's continued aggression in the region and the continued destabilization of the Iraq war. Trump also has no plan to deal with the serious threat of Iran's continued aggression in the region and the continued destabilization of the Iraq war. In fact, the Iran deal, which Trump has threatened to pull out of and has already formally pulled out of, is seen as a source of stability to Iran and a force of moderation among the area's Shia, Sunnis and Kurds. Trump and his administration have played an active role in undermining the
